DOCTORAL DISSERTATION

Affluence and the gender gap in STEM study choices

This article-based dissertation examines how societal affluence, occupational opportunities, and household resources relate to gendered STEM aspirations, higher education entry, and graduation. Four studies use UNESCO, TIMSS, NEPS, and CFPS data, combining cross-national comparisons with evidence from Germany and China.

The findings distinguish general economic security, which is associated with wider STEM gender gaps, from STEM-specific rewards and accessibility, which are associated with narrower gaps. Household income in Germany and assets beyond housing in China also show contrasting associations with women's STEM entry.
